	The 'liquidity crisis' view	50
	The 'systemic financial failure' view	51
	Myths that Contributed to Misconceptions on the Macroeconomic Aspects of the East Asian Crisis	51
	First myth: economic crisis should be solved by blanket reduction of aggregate demand	51
	Second myth: financial markets are always efficient and rational	52
	Third myth: crises are solely caused by too much government intervention or lack of transparency	52
	Fourth myth: we can abstract from the political and social stability conditions	63
	Myth five: there is a dichotomy between the financial and real sectors of the economy	63
	Myth six: the East Asian Tigers were invincible and always had sound macroeconomic fundamentals	64
	The Macroeconomic Fundamentals of the East Asian Five Before the Crisis	64

Chapter 5 Regulatory Challenges to Reform in Banking and Corporate Rehabilitation 85
 Maria Socorro Gochoco-Bautista and Renato E. Reside, Jr.

Introduction	85
The Banking Sector	86
A Profile of Financially Distressed Firms	91
Empirical Verification of the Relationship between the Corporate and Financial Sectors	97
Banks fail to report their corporate NPLs in a manner consistent with prudential norms or the BSP does not follow conservative standards when reporting asset quality	99
Distressed corporations fail to report their true financial condition to creditors, causing creditors to overestimate the quality of their exposure to these firms	101
The banking system does not carry a substantial exposure to the corporate sector	102
Even if NPLs are sufficiently distributed across banks, banks are sufficiently capitalized individually to absorb large adverse shocks emanating from the corporate sector	103
Some Regulatory and Supervisory Challenges	103
