

Acknowledgments

This book would not have been published without the cooperation of villagers in the three study villages. With much hospitality, as elsewhere in Ghana, they provided me with all the assistance I needed during my fieldwork. In particular, I would like to thank Nana Opoku Danso, Nana Anokye Mathew, and Nana Kwadwo Gyaha for accepting me into their villages, and Beatrice Ahiwireng, N. P. Dankwah, James Addo, Mohamed Ali, Evans Dwuma Adams, Naomi Donkor, Tom Budu, and Dora Ansah for their help in interviews.

During my two-year stay from 1995 to 1997 for my research in Ghana, the Institute of Statistical, Social and Economic Research (ISSER), the University of Ghana, provided me with an excellent research environment. I am grateful to the management and colleagues of the ISSER, especially Professors Kwadwo Asenso-Okyere and S. Y. Atsu. I am particularly indebted to Dr. V. K. Nyanteng for his outstanding academic and personal support. Special thanks are also due to my best friend, Sam B. Ofose, who traveled with me and arranged my stay in villages.

Back in Japan, I benefited from the many comments from my colleagues at the Institute of Developing Economies (IDE). My sincere thanks also go to ex-IDE researchers and now professors Shirō Kodamaya (at Hitotsubashi University), Akio Takahashi (at the University of Tokyo), Shūhei Shimada (at Kyoto University), and Jun Ikeno (also at Kyoto University) for their suggestions on the manuscript.

Finally, I dedicate this book to my family.
